

The Organizer

My definition – a compilation, really - of an organizer reads as follows:

- An organizer is a person who knows how to create something out of nothing.
- An organizer is a person who takes something that does not now exist, and make it exist.
- An organizer is a person who creates his/her own reality.
- An organizer is a person who knows how to create a path of forward motion moving from the known to the unknown.
- An organizer is a person who knows how to shape chaos.
- An organizer is a person who recognizes the blind alley, knows how to alter course, and pick up the pieces.
- An organizer is not the person who does all the work, but the person who knows what work has to be done, who can do it, and why.
- An organizer is the person who interprets for others the small victory achieved today, which will surely lead to a larger victory tomorrow.
- An organizer is the person who recognizes the seeds of victory sewn in today's defeat.
- An organizer is a person who does not ask others to do what he/she will not.
- An organizer is the person who leads not by fiery bombast, but by example, by patient teaching, by their wits, and by a stubborn persistence.
- An organizer is the person so convinced, that others see the need to help.
- An organizer is the person who organizes the march, not the person who leads the march.
- An organizer is the person who does not accept no for the answer.
- An organizer is not an administrator, that is another person.
